Remodeling Face

Newport Beach's Athenian Skin Care takes beautification to another level – literally – with its Remodeling Face Treatment, which uses microcurrent technology to stimulate the face muscles for a rejuvenating facial. According to spa owner Alexis Agoritsas, the treatment is beneficial for everyone, but in particular, it can help those clients receiving regular doses of Botox and other such wrinkle-fighting treatments. After years of receiving these kinds of injections, which temporarily immobilize targeted face muscles, those muscles could atrophy in the long term, says Agoritsas – which is where the microcurrent facial comes in. "The microcurrent electricity plumps the muscle and brings it up to its original place," Agoritsas says. "With the years, the muscles become flat and heavy. This is an excellent form of facial exercising."

The Remodeling Face Machine – by Paris-based Biologique Recherche – releases currents on the surface of the skin with the help of two sponges and special serums. "The [Biologique Recherche] serums are customized for each skin's needs or conditions," Agoritsas says.

According to Biologique Recherche, the Remodeling Face Machine uses three types of current that can be used separately or in combination for even more personalized treatment.

Clients may feel the minor tingling of electricity, but no pain, Agoritsas says. The treatment can be received indefinitely on a bimonthly or monthly basis following an initial series of treatments. The treatments can replace all other facials, according to Agoritsas.
